Back-end Database for a Media Sharing Website

Introduction

For our project, we have decided to design a database that would be used as the back-end for a media sharing site similar to Imgur.com. The site allows users to upload different kind of media items and search, browse, and view them. The database tracks data on the registered users of the site and the media they have uploaded to support the site. In addition, the site offers a few features that require back-end data management, such as the ability to comment on images, and the ability to curate individual collections of media in personal albums.

The Diagram

The center of the database is the user entity. This represents every registered user of the site, identified by a unique username the program code helps them to choose when they register and create an account. This entity also contains information about users the system will need often, such as their password, (hashed for security), their role (the level of admin privileges they have to modify the images or albums of other users), and their viewing preferences (whether they wish to be able to view NSFW images). Users can choose to "watch" other users, being notified when they upload new items. This is represented with the self-referential relationship, "watches."

Next in importance is the media entity. This represents the various media files users upload to the site. It tracks all the data that can relate to any media file, such as title, description, upload date, path to the file, and more. It also tracks thumbnails for each item that can be used to show browse pages, which are auto-generated by the side code when a media item is uploaded. The site allows users to "tag" media they upload with descriptive subject terms that help users locate similar items when using the site search-these tags are determined by the site administrators, and there's no limit on the number of tags that can be attached to a single item. This is represented with a multi-valued attribute, "tags." Each item is "owned" by one user, but users may upload multiple items, as represented by the "uploads" relationship. Each media item is assigned its own unique numeric ID when it is uploaded. Finally, users may "favorite" media items to find them more easily later. The relationship tracks how many media items the users has marked as a favorite for display purposes.

Because different type of media files have their own specific qualities, we have broken media down into a few subtypes for specific kinds of media: images, representing still images (and animated gifs), video, representing audiovisual media, audio, representing audio files, and text, representing PDF, word documents, or text files. Each of these child entities tracks information specific to the kind of media it represents, such as duration for audio and video files, or file quality for video. The site uses this information to play, display, or describe the appropriate media to the users.

Those are the essential entities required to power the basic site functionality. In addition, some other data structures will be necessary to support features and added functionality:

The comments entity tracks data about user generated comments, which users can attach to any media item posted to the site. Each comment is assigned its own unique identification number when it is created (c_uuid.) The entity tracks the actual content of the comment as well as a five-star rating users can attach to the image, and the date the comment was made. Finally, the site allows users to respond to the comments others have left-we represent this with the self-referential relationship "reply to." This relationship tracks the order in which responses were made to the original comment so that the site can display them properly. Users can make any number of comments, but each comment has only one user, represented by the "give" relationship. Also, each comment can be attached to only one media item, but media items can have many comments, represented by the "on" relationship.

The albums entity tracks user-curated collections of media, their own or those posted by other users, or a combination of the two. Albums are identified based on the user who created them, as well as a user-generated name for the album (a_uuid), which must be unique only to a particular user. This entity contains album level information such as the name of the album, the user it belongs to, and the date the album was created. Users may have any number of albums, but each album has only one user, as represented by the "maintains" relationship. Each album has media items associated with it, and multiple media items can be associated with multiple albums. This is represented by the "In" relationship, which tracks when the item was added to the album and the order the user has chosen for items to display in the album.

Integrity Constraints

IC Name and Tables	IC Type	English Statement	Implemented	Tested
Username, users	Key	Users must have a unique username	A1	A113
Username, Media	Foreign Key	Each media item has one user who owns it	A2	A113
Role, Users	1 attribute	A user can only have one of four predetermined roles	A1	A113
Is18, Users	2 attribute, 1 row	Users must be 18 or over to set NSFW to "allow."	A5	A113
Has_three_media, Media	2 row, one table	Users must upload at least three media items in order to make any albums.	A5	A113
